Coping with Grief and Trauma

- When a tragedy or disaster happens, it can change your life in an instant.
- For example:
 - › An accident
 - › Community violence
 - › A death
 - › A fire
 - › A flood
 - › An overdose
 - › A suicide

These are just examples. You can grieve any loss or change.

When this happens, it can be helpful to remember:

- › It is common to have a strong reaction to these types of events.
- › These events can be hard to go through. Any reaction is a natural part of the healing process.
- › Try to be gentle with yourself as you work through this.
- › Acknowledge your experiences instead of ignoring them. This is how you can start to recover.

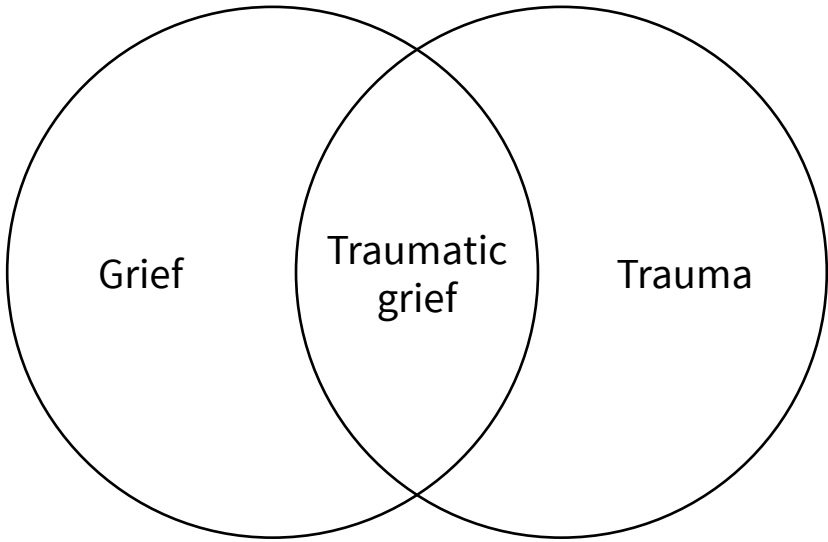

Understanding grief

- Grief is normal.
 - › It is a human response to loss and change of any kind. Sudden and tragic death can be even harder. Grief does not follow a timeline or happen in stages.
- Grief is not just sadness.
 - › It can impact your physical, emotional, mental, social, and spiritual wellbeing.
- Grief can feel like a mix of emotions.
 - › You may experience sadness, anger, relief, shame, guilt, and other emotions.
 - › You may experience these feelings all at the same time, or not at all.
- Grief is as unique as you are.
 - › There is no “right way” to grieve. It is your grief.
- Infants, children, and youth also grieve.
 - › They can grieve just as much and deeply as adults do.

Understanding trauma

- Trauma can happen after an overwhelming event. It can keep your nervous system on high alert even after the danger is gone.
- Trauma affects people differently. Your nervous system sees trauma as a threat and can respond in different and unique ways.
- Avoiding certain thoughts, memories, and feelings only helps for a short time. This can cause them to be more intense when they come back.
- Trauma can make grief even harder to cope with.
- While not every exposure to trauma will cause traumatic grief, it can happen when a loss is sudden, unexpected, and extremely upsetting.

What is traumatic grief?

Traumatic grief

- Having intense reactions to an overwhelming event is normal. When it keeps affecting your daily life, it may be time to ask for help. See page 7 for information on how to find resources.

Traumatic grief can look like:

- › Fear or not feeling safe
- › Feeling “stuck”
- › Trouble in relationships
- › Flashbacks
- › Inability to focus and memory problems
- › Intrusive (unwanted) thoughts, nightmares, trouble sleeping

- › Lack of self-control
- › Strong emotional reactions that feel overwhelming or disproportionate (not equal) to everyday situations
- › Numbing your feelings with drugs or alcohol
- › Changes in your beliefs or sense of meaning in life
- › Refusing to believe someone has died
- › Having thoughts of joining the person who died

What can help?

- Follow healthy practices and routines, starting with easy changes.
 - › Check in with yourself often.
 - › Take steps to get enough sleep.
 - › Eat healthy meals regularly.
 - › Drink enough fluids.
 - › Move (go for a walk, exercise, sports).
 - › Do activities you enjoy.
- Acknowledge and validate how you are feeling.
 - › Let yourself grieve without judgement.
 - › Experiencing grief can honour your loss.

- Try to find ways to be in relaxing environments.
 - › Go for a walk, spend time in nature, or listen to calming music.
 - › Take breaks from reading the news, scrolling social media, or anything that shows violence or death.
- Lean on others.
 - › Reach out to a family member, a friend, a faith leader, a trusted coworker, or a neighbour.
- Be gentle with yourself.
 - › Take a break from people who are not supportive.
 - › Give yourself space to grieve.
